Dear Mr. Fawcett

I am very doubtful indeed about this "address to candidates". In its present form I think it is calculated to do actual harm.

I am inclined to think that
"an address to candidates" might be put into a very valuable shape, but we would have to think it out most carefully.

14. I don't think it is any good to try to write one until after the fate of our Bill is decided. We could begin our "address" by stating the fate of our Bill etc. & make the whole most sober in tone.

Your sentence ^{in address} is exactly what we want to state, but it would never do to lead up to it by
"we desire to press".

Miss Blackburn's ideas are most excellent, but they always evolve with difficulty & ambiguities

It may be that we could really after this general interest that will be raised our Bill

draw up an address which the leading newspapers would insert & comment upon. If this should seem good & possible, then the most "leading women" who sign throughout the country the letter - especially the leading Procureresses. Anyway
let us consider this by & by.
I will tell Miss Blackburn what occurs to me & tell her you have let me see the draft.

I don't feel that it is every use my tinkering at this draft.
I suspect my ideas are very much the same as yours on the whole matter

Auntie Healdin

I have this news of the Evans girl's more superior but do not see Auntie's worth in one more
element.

There is a most amusing letter from our good

Mr. Charles, this morning

Please let me have it back.

I had no idea he was such a clear reader of character!

My idea now is to send the letter to Miss Ebroys (where letters used to go some part there)

She is a very clear & uncommon person & if there is any place near Berkeley fit for my mill girl I think she can get it for her. This plan has only occurred to me today.

Ben's writes me he saw my Blackburn yesterday & from his account of the proposed new wording of Bill I feel a hope that it is going to prove a great gain. We have never had a really
